

The Language is ailing. She is suffering from persistent attacks of foreign words, vulgarisation and linguistic over-complications. She used to be a language of clarity that surpassed any foreign language and prided herself on how expressive she was.

The first cause of this ailment is Arabic's flesh and blood, who have never ceased to call Arabic their national language - heedless of how corrupted she has been by her fraudster leaders and speech-makers.

The second cause is the prevalence of illiteracy among the so-called her people, who are content to prattle on in dialect. Ignorance has infected the majority of her intelligentsia.

The third cause is that Arabic has been targeted by other national languages and dedicated speakers who take pride in these languages. They've prevailed because they've been well-looked after by exemplary devotees who teach them, develop them and spread them.

The outcries warning us about her collapse have grown louder. Copy-editors have worked tirelessly to produce tome after tome calling out slips of the tongue and errors of the pen.

But the ears of those meant to look after her have grown steadily deaf, as have those of the profiteers who pretended to serve her. Ears ever more obscured by outlandish excuses about dumb excuses and senseless chattering of fools.
